Built as a factory c. 1945, this is Westminster's only example of the "International Style" of architecture. This style began in Europe in the 1920s and '30s as a response to modern advances in technology and developments in economics. In the words of LeCorbusier, an innovator of this manner of building; "A new epoch has begun . . . Industry, overwhelming us like a flood which rolls towards its destined end, has furnished us with new tools adopted to this epoch . . . Absence of verbosity, good arrangement, a single idea, daring and unity in construction, the use of elementary shapes, a sane morality . . . the concrete piers of uniform section, the flat vault of the ceilings, the standardized window-units, the solids, and the voids, make up the architectural elements of the construction."
